

What would you investigate?

Work with a researcher or specialist in the subject you care about, online and around the school day. Mentors come from a network that includes researchers at Harvard, Oxford, NYU and Columbia.

THE KIND OF QUESTION STUDENTS DEVELOP WITH THEIR MENTORS

- I What does the neuroscience of sleep deprivation reveal about adolescent learning and mental health?
- II Should autonomous vehicles be programmed with explicit ethical rules, and if so, whose values should those rules reflect?
- III What does the commercialisation of streetwear reveal about how fashion mediates between subculture and mainstream culture?

THREE WAYS TO WORK WITH US

|                     |                                                                                                                                                                |
|---------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Research Scholar    | One-to-one with a doctoral or postdoctoral researcher for eight weeks or more. You write a paper of your own, typically 3,000 to 5,000 words, then present it. |
| Field Seminars      | A university-style seminar course in one field, for one to three students, ending in a research essay or project.                                              |
| Academic Essentials | Academic writing, English and research skills, from a plan built around you.                                                                                   |

WHAT YOU LEAVE WITH

Work of your own

An essay, paper or project you wrote yourself.

Feedback from the field

Written comments at each stage from someone who works in the subject.

Something real to discuss

A specific piece of work to talk about in applications and interviews.

You write every word. Your mentor questions, teaches and gives feedback.
